Maximilian's Rule in Mexico.

The most stringent misery is visible everywhere; the greatest economy is practiced by those deemed wealthy; four per cent. a month is asked and obtained; there is no trade, no improvement, except in the imperial residences of Chapultepec and the National Palace. The city, it is true, has increased, but this is the natural result of the distrust of the inhabitants of the country, who seek the protection of a large city.

Maximilian, not satisfied with $5,000 a day, which he had appointed himself as salary, has now raised the sum to $7,000 per day, as he declares he cannot live for less. The balls at the Palace are magnificent affairs; the luxury of the toilets are beyond the limits of description of a republican pen. People may groan, but the Court dances and amuses itself.

Great indignation is now openly manifested by all classes at Maximilian's extravagance. The salaries of all officers have been reduced to a most economical basis to increase his own. This caused great complaint among the imperialists, which is not ameliorated by the irregularity of their payments. There is, there can be no revenue; the French treasury, month after month, pays the deficit of Maximilian. How long France will keep it up, only Napoleon knows, if even he knows.

No one dares to go into the country, for they are threatened by both parties. If an hacienda has the very great misfortune of being visited by a party of Liberals, who generally help themselves to what they want, it is immediately punished for so being treated by the Imperialists carrying off the balance of what is left, and probably having all the men impressed into the service of his majesty. Max. has been so indignant at the scandalous desertions of his native troops, as he says, that his officers no longer report any one missing; they simply taken the first man they meet to replace the one who has gone.
